Society History

The Medical Society of the United States and Mexico was founded to unite physicians of the United States of America and the Republic of Mexico for better understanding and solutions of mutual problems and needs in medicine. It is one of the few multi-specialty international organizations covering all general and specialty areas of medicine. The organization is composed of physicians from southwestern United States (California, Arizona, New Mexico and Texas) with scattered membership throughout the other states, and doctors from Northern Mexico and Guadalajara.

Each country has its own officers, who frequently consult with each other, holding a combined board meeting twice a year. The Society promotes scientific exchange between its members and free dialogue for case and clinical investigation of specialty areas important, both currently and historically to physicians of both countries. A scientific program is held each year at various sites in the United States or Mexico. The multi-specialty diversity of the program permits medical specialists to become reacquainted with current clinical developments in associated areas of medicine and allowing them to relate this knowledge to their own practice. Although the Medical Society of the United States and Mexico has a strong scientific basis, the social and cultural aspects of the organization are considered to be equally important, and meetings are held in areas of cultural and historic prominence.

Although the Medical Society of the United States and Mexico has a strong scientific basis, the social and cultural aspects of the organization are considered to be equally important, and meetings are held in areas of cultural and historic prominence. The organization stresses the cultural aspects of the two countries.

In 1953, Harry Thompson, M.D. and Hector Gonzales Guevara, M.D., initiated the Medical Society of Southern Sinaloa in Mazatlan. Aided, in particular by Doctors W.E. Manning, Robert E. Hastings, William Schultz, Leo Kent, and Albert L. Guevara, Ignacio Chavez and Alfonso Topete, the Society evolved into the Medical Society of the United States and Mexico meeting in Tucson on November 25, 1956.

It's mission of shared medical scientific progress, coupled with twin country respect and friendship, has sustained and cherished this Society to date.
